Looking to bolster your language proficiency or delve into the literary tradition of your host country?

Some things to consider: for language learning, when you go matters and for studying literature, where you go might matter less than you think. While all motivated students can become more proficient speakers of another language through a study abroad experience, studies show that the impact is most profound for students at the intermediate level (or higher). And if you are a literature major, think outside the box on for study abroad locations. You might fall in love with Spanish literature, Czech drama, or Italian poetry. Or explore Ireland, Scotland, and South Africa – all with rich literary traditions as well.

If you need help finding specific courses that you need to take abroad, visit studiesabroad.com/course-finder and our expert advisors will be in touch with you with some program options!
